What type of content does the National Law Review publish?

We are looking for well-researched legal analysis or legal news articles that will help educate professionals and consumers interested in emerging legal and business issues. To review the National Law Review's editorial

We do not publish press releases, publicity items, court pleadings or legal forms. And since we like to get to know our authors, we are not the best platform for a one-time article publication.

We upload and publish our content quickly and around the clock. For each author and organization, we develop an author biography and an organizational profile. Accordingly, we prefer on-going relationships with our authors so we can publish their content swiftly and professionally.

To maximize the exposure of your thought leadership, the National Law Review:

Uploads your thought leadership and author profiles into proper HTML, optimizing your content for enhanced Search Engine Optimization.

Publishes your thought leadership on a time honored legal publication. New content publishes hourly to our legal news homepage.

Broadcasts your thought leadership via Twitter, Facebook, LinkedIn and Google+ around the clock. Select publication on the National Law Review's blog, too.

Circulates your thought leadership to our 130,000+ legal update subscribers.

Distributes your thought leadership to professional associations and other publications through partners such as Google News, MSN, LexisNexis, Thomson West Reuters, Findlaw, BNA, Yahoo News and Bloomberg.

Delivers usable, real time data about the readership of your content available on-line.

How working with the National Law Review impacts you:
